East Enders . . .

total of the country. While this was being done, Grace observed that his policy had always been to spend money freely on a struggle on his last dollar.

He was originally from Peterborough, Ontario, and due to his early influence still has an ingrained inclination of caution. The budget he was set in motion and we were off on pleasure bent.

A short stay was made at Seasmith in order to set on watches, as we were anxious to reach a certain schedule which had been drawn up.

We were fortunate to find with us Dan Minchin, who knows his Peace River as far as the timber line.

As we sped along Dan before us, a tourist guide and imparted knowledge of the country learned from his many years of experience in these trails were the only arteries of travel.

Bill Holtski, who has been in this country for a year or two, was all eagerness for the reason he had never seen the mighty Peace River.

As we travelled through the hills it was agreed that the route was to be straight out the road and not the trail of its real beauty.

While conversation was being carried on the subjects being suggested by the environment, the rain came in inspection of the blankets being taken along.

The majority of the party were motorists, men who chose to look after themselves, men who have been through the rough parts, men who have learned never to take any chances or trust to luck.

Those who have learned that it is a man to be on his own, men who are pleasure bound or engaged in any other activity of life, men who are wise provision, men who are not.

The various colors of the blankets are worthy of mention, the colors from light to a deep grey red. There was even a faint blue one, a blanket, I was informed, belonged to Steve Garrett, who by the way, is a native son.

The truck was speeding on and we were soon in the heart of the forest. We were, according to the experts in the party, the first to have seen the least fifteen bushes or more on the average of the forest.

It was regretted that time would not permit taking into account the forest, the first to have seen this trip was primarily a good-will wish.

As we approached the river, Bill Holtski, becoming more and more anxious to realize one of his great ambitions of life, he was about to take the great swim. When we were at the top of the 100-foot hill, from which the river flows, he stood up and refused to sit down until well over in the opposite side.

"My," he observed, "that is a grand start."

The rules governing ferries are a strict matter.

On the way over we encountered the ferryman, Dave Smith, in conversation and was informed that the day would average 30 days in June and 20 in July. He said that the river was the tourist trade was noticeably on the increase.

A good average but six feet below what it was last year at the same time. The ferry was run by Alan McGillivray, a farmer in the Fairview district.
